

China crushed protests 25 years ago, and won't let its people talk of it

By Philadelphia Inquirer, adapted by Newsela staff

A Chinese man stands alone to block a line of tanks heading east on Beijing's Cangan Boulevard in Tiananmen Square on June 5, 1989. The man, calling for an end to the violence and bloodshed against pro-democracy demonstrators, was pulled away by bystanders, and the tanks continued on their way. Photo: AP Photo/Jeff Widener just died and young people went to march on the square in mourning. Yaobang was a popular leader in China because he had changed many old rules and was making the government more modern.

More and more protesters arrived over the coming weeks, eventually numbering hundreds of thousands. They demanded freedom of speech and of the press, and even built a Statue of Liberty figure called the Goddess of Democracy.

A sense grew worldwide that the Chinese government would soon be toppled.

Instead, on June 4, the government ordered the military to clear the square. Army units advanced from every direction, opening fire on protesters, bystanders and people in nearby buildings. An accurate death toll has never been reached. Estimates range from a few hundred to a few thousand.

"May 35th"

Historian Maura Cunningham says that today there's only one safe way to hold an online discussion about what happened in Tiananmen Square: You have to speak in code.

Don't mention "June 4th," the date that tanks rolled against unarmed protesters. Instead, try "May 35th" — a count of that month's 31 days plus four in June. It's a way to avoid the lurking presence of the government, and to prevent what you've written from being removed.

The game being played between citizen and government isn't exactly cat-and-mouse, said Cunningham.

It's more like whack-a-mole: Each time the government whacks forbidden online speech, it pops up again somewhere else.

"The Internet is a bigger and bigger part of life in China," Cunningham said in an interview. "But it's becoming more and more complicated."
